Leave your bottles in the donation basket near the Cristo Rey display. Happy Ketchup shopping and THANK YOU!

WOMEN'S LEGGINGS AND SPORTS BRAS ALSO NEEDED

Cristo Rey has a desperate need for new Leggings and Sports Bras for refugee women living in the shelters and on the streets in El Paso and we want to take many of them down on our trip as well.. Please place them in the donation basket by the Cristo Rey display....

Earth Corner: The Season of Creation : “Let Justice and Peace Flow”

Dr. Jared Orsi, professor of history at Colorado State University, has recently completed his one year appointment as Colorado State Historian. Dr. Orsi has taught at CSU for 22 years, his courses include U.S. Mexico Borderlands and U.S. Environmental History. He will address the question of what the history of public lands tells us about the treatment of indigenous people and people of color.

In an interview that is posted on the History Colorado website, Dr. Orsi answers the question: What does the history of public lands tell us about the treatment of Indigenous people?

“Most public lands became public through a process of dispossessing the Indigenous people who already lived there and erasing evidence of their presence. So public lands are deeply embedded in the nation’s colonial legacy. Still, Frederick Law Olmsted, an early commissioner of Yosemite, said that enjoyment of the outdoors was a fundamental right of all people, and he meant that broadly. That means that public lands are also rooted in the most equitable aspects of the American democratic traditions. They have both deeply problematic histories and the potential to advance equity and inclusiveness. Indigenous peoples and public land stewards can work to improve access to public lands, collaboratively manage them, and ensure that public lands tell important Native stories. But that requires more work.” -Jared Orsi, 2022

Equally concerning is the low participation of people of color on public lands; many have rarely explored these places or developed an attachment to them. This lack of connection is particularly evident in low-income communities and communities of color, which have much lower rates of participation in outdoor recreation. In order for public lands to truly become a “common ground” for all people, we need to have proper representation from all people. Ensuring equitable access to the physical and mental benefits of public lands is more than a land-use issue: It is a social justice issue.

–Roland Richardson, National Parks & Rec Magazine 4-3-2017

What can ordinary people do about climate change?

Plan to attend the lecture by Dr. Jared Orsi, the 2022-23 State historian. Invite friends to attend as well. The lecture will be held on Saturday, September 16, 2:00 PM in the sanctuary.
